Improved Winter Combats State, Catholic University This Week

WITH THE BLUE DEVILS

DICK PIPER, Sports Editor

Column note: with the intramural games in full swing, Ken Gerard and his cohorts have the task of sorting and telling all athletes of the Duke outside the field of varsity sports. The space for this week's column is for intramurals, both in local interest and nationwide, and the material has been written up by Johnny Maher.

Development of Intramural Standards

TO ESTABLISH a smooth-running intramural athletic department, both the knowledge of the sports which are played and an understanding of the benefits the students receive from their participation are needed. The department's work is made more comprehensive by reports which circulate from time to time from other schools of the country.

Probably the best standard is a combination of the systems of intramural athletics in use at the University of Illinois and Michigan. Illinois, for the type of setting, and Michigan, for its overall attendance to the student's needs, are intramural superpowers, and to spend a year in the program, the department at Duke, under Coach Gerard, find the Illinois system the best model to follow.

Michigan's Program Full and Well-Equipped

THE INTRAMURAL field house at the University of Michigan is one of the largest of its kind in any college in America. It contains almost every conceivable facility for indoor sport and recreation. The great advantage is the fact that all varsity practices and games are played in a special gym used only for that sport. In this way, intramural sports are carried on in its field house exclusively.

The handling of this new building has greatly enlarged the program in Michigan. Following activities involving basketball, boxing, wrestling, football, basketball, squash, indoor basketball, volleyball, indoor golf, water polo and tennis are provided for the use of some 4,000 men of the undergraduate body, graduates, and faculty.

The department at Michigan attempts to provide facilities for every branch of sport in which the student is interested. Because of the competitive nature of the sports, the department at Michigan is able to provide a recreational type of program to accommodate those who prefer them.

The program has been altered from year to year, as experience dictated. A few sports being dropped when they proved undesirable for intramural competition and others being added as popularity in them grew. At the present time a total of 20 sports are being promoted.

Southern Conference Colleges Progress Slowly

A RECENT REPORT from the intramural departments of the school in the southern conference shows the trend which this type of activity is following. At least intramural athletics have found a definite place as an extracurricular activity in the college program. The general trend of activity in this conference is to make the intramural department one division of the physical education branch.

The majority of departments are financially supported by a separate budget, provided for in the budget of the department of physical education and by the athletic department for team sports.

A lack of printed materials on the intramural department in various departments of the southern conference keeps other schools within the conference from incorporating new ideas and plans of organization. Intramural department heads are reluctant to reveal their plans for the future. A physical examination before permitting contestants to take part in at least the more strenuous sports such as boxing, wrestling, cross-country, and basketball.

The physical education department of fourteen schools in the South shows a definite inter-relationship with the intramural department in the matter of teaching fundamentals in the sports offered in the intramural program. The number of sports ranges from seven to twenty. The average sports program contains 13 sports, including those having single and double events. The following are a part of a typical program: basketball, tennis, track, baseball, volleyball, basketball, indoor basketball, wrestling, swimming, handball, cross-country, horseback riding, table football, and golf.

The average department has just enough equipment to care for those sports considered essential in a well-rounded program, but not enough to provide for the sports such as bowling, squash, etc.
