"Have you got a fountain pen that writes?"

"I didn't do my English, so I guess I'll cut it."

"I never go into the Post Office on purpose anymore, but I have to pass through it going from my room to the front door every day."

"Can you cash a check?"

"O-o-o-h, that history quiz!"

"Somebody lend me a dime, and I'll pay it back when my check comes next month."

"Don't take her on a date, she always gets limeric."

"Two cherry dopes with lots 'n' lots 'n' lots of ice."

"Two vanilla dopes with lots 'n' lots 'n' lots of ice."

"So I told him I wouldn't stand that sort of thing, and he hasn't called up since . . . these Sig Eps?"

"Hrr, Jack, here's Roscoe's 'Confessions' unexpurgated! Got a buck?"

"A package of these and one of those and a large dope."

"I slept through my eight o'clock on account of last night I . . . large tomato juice, please."

"But these shoes are too big for me. I can't play hockey in canal boats."

"I can't understand why I've gained so much weight. A bit fudge sundae with nuts, please."

"And he said, 'Miss Jones, how often have you heard of lighting striking a moving automobile?' and I said 'Only once, Professor, only once!'"

"I might as well be a plutocrat. I just got my check . . . two packages of Marlboro, please."

"One vanilla dope, three plain come the presidential candidate, and the heavy was to be content with the vice-presidency. Both were fairly rare of their places in the lineup. A half-dollar was flipped, and the winner went on to become president of the student body. He was a good president, too, in case you wonder.

You probably wouldn't believe that cigarette advertising not be run in old Trinity publications, but a former head of one of the Journals is authority for the fact that he once was barred from placing any cigarette advertising. But times have changed!

They tell a humorous tale in these parts on Freddie Crawford, the demon tackle who once terrorized Duke football opponents. True or untrue, it has its points. It seems that Freddie had ended his days at Duke and was considering some professional football propositions. One of the teams offering him a position was playing a game on a certain night, and the co-Dukester went to the stadium to watch the proceedings.

He watched a brutal bull ramp and team over the opposition at will, and is said to have made up his mind right then and there:

"Whoever that fellow is, I want to play with him, not against him." It apparently was just a bit of that characteristic Crawford modesty, for Fred could have kept going with the good he had chosen to stick to professional football.

A bunch was laughing the other day over a prank once played upon a student of religion at Duke. He was said to be the kind of fellow who sought extreme isolation. This fact inspired a group of mischievous boys to play a little prank. Obtaining two large breadcrumbs, they lighned them and tossed them into the room by way of a window. One exploded, the other found its way under the mattress.

Several hours later, when all was quiet at 3 a.m., the said student found it necessary to arise from his bed in a hurry. It was on fire, the mattress having burned half away. The incident was reported to an administrative head, who immediately set out to find the unidentified scoundrels. It is said he never knew that two certain undergraduates who diligently helped him seek the culprits were the culprits themselves!

There's one more little incident that comes to mind, and it concerns what may have been the greatest chase a Freshman ever led on upperclassmen. It happened on the east campus the last year it was occupied by boys.
